A Message To Generation Z:

REGARDING THE COST OF RENTAL PROPERTY AND HOUSING

I'm thirty years old and I'm sick of flatting. I don't want to share a kitchen or a laundry with anyone. In my early twenties I shared housing with strangers and it was the worst. My personal possessions were stolen or interfered with and I could hear people "going-at-it" through the other side of the wall. My car was damaged from scrapes due to poor car park design, among many other headaches.

Earlier this year I was working 45 hours per week at $21 per hour. Each week I received $637 in the bank. That is after tax and after the standard student loan deduction.

There's a big problem here: the best town-houses and apartments are ones that you don't have to share with strangers - these usually cost as low as $395 per week, and as high as $550 per week. A man or woman who works full time should have enough money to buy a basic 50 square metre apartment.

If I earn $600 or $700 a week then I cannot realistically buy - or even rent - an apartment. I wouldn't be able to buy food or fuel and I wouldn't be saving any money - I would be a slave to my landlord - they will earn 50% of my income just because they can buy property and force me out of the market. I could get a flatmate, but then I'm dependent on strangers to pay my landlord. Another reason why I'm opposed to renting with a flatmate is because most new properties have no acoustic insulation - there is nothing between the bedroom walls except for a sheet of GIB. Personally I can't stand hearing people cough or snore from through the wall. I want my own space where I have peace. No distraction or noise what-so-ever. No flatmates.

If I was fabulously wealthy then I would tolerate living with a wife and children, but under no circumstances would I desire to live with someone else's wife and children. Recently I saw an online advertisement by a guy who was 45 and freshly divorced with a 2 year old daughter. He said that anyone who rents with him would have to meet his daughter, which I thought was weird.

The media never discuss this, but the truth is that New Zealand homes suffer from poor design. New Zealand homes are built from budget construction materials, and they are very over-priced for what they are. We're forced to have flatmates, even as grown-up men and women who ought to be married with children. I've never lived overseas but my online pal Katya rents in Saint Petersburg and she has an apartment, and she's in her twenties. Her apartment is on the 24th floor if I recall. During our Skype chat she briefly opened the window, risking the cold, to show me the view outside - all other nearby buildings were similar apartments with 30+ floors. New Zealanders could learn a lot from this.

Why are we limiting constructions in Canterbury to a maximum of six floors? The land in Selwyn and Rangiora is stable enough for the construction of apartments. The rental price outrage and the general housing crisis is by design. Members of Parliament own property, and they are making policy that protects their own wealth. What politicians are doing for housing, is akin to fighting an obesity epidemic with cakes and pies. Indeed, it's very nice for those who have a vested interest in a certain area of investment.

There is plenty of land in Rolleston and Rangiora but it isn't being zoned for residential construction. When it does get zoned, developers only want to build $500,000 or $800,000 homes and then sell those homes to wealthy immigrants or boomers. If the farmland in Rolleston is so precious, then why are developers allowed to build palatial 4 bedroom houses on them? Here's a bright idea, why doesn't somebody build high-rise apartments in Rolleston, Hornby and Halswell, and link them up with a 24-hour bus service? Oh but those poor boomers - the apartments would look like a Soviet dystopia and they would lower the value of boomer-owned land!

Politicians and the council think that millennials and zoomers are idiots. Clearly. Because our generations vote for the politicians, thinking they will resolve the situation, but instead they do nothing. They want property values to increase because it makes the economy look good on paper, and it means that the rich get richer (as clichéd as it sounds). Parliament desires a tightly controlled housing market and unaffordable, low quality, shared rental accommodation for millennials/zoomers. Opening up the housing market would plunge property prices - all of the boomers and all of those out-of-town landlords (some of whom don't even live in New Zealand) would stop donating to political campaigns. Politicians would be out of work and that wouldn't be convenient for them or their comfortable lives.

The young generations will get nowhere if we have to pay 30% or 50% of our income toward rent and utilities. Not all of us get into uni and graduate directly into a government job that pays an $80,000 salary. New Zealand is just going to keep being a trashy third world nation if we keep conforming to the beliefs of gay pride and climate change. Instead of gay pride, why don't we have cheap rent, and make it possible for heterosexual couples to have more children, and sooner, too? Gay pride and banal corporate culture has distracted us from marrying and having children. Society was better 40 years ago, when a couple in their mid-twenties could raise a family and buy a house with a big yard for the children to play in. Is homosexual marriage honestly an achievement when it's stacked-up against the fact that most women in their twenties and early thirties are childless? I know what I care about more - and it isn't those silly rainbow flags on the websites of the major banks.

If everybody conforms to the mainstream "wisdom" of climate strikes, feminism, marxism, social media orthodoxy, cancel culture and other rubbish then we won't get anywhere as a nation. That's why I'm appealing to those in the 17-23 age range to think outside the ordinary and become brave political warriors who shove the truth in everyone's faces even if it means that banks, corporations and government departments hate us for it. Just because some computer science graduate has an uncle who works for the GCSB, or works as a lawyer for SIS, that doesn't mean their relatives can't criticise the government online or at a protest down at Cathedral Square. Grow a pair, lads!

If this message finds approval among any zoomer generation kids then I welcome you all to join the free speech website gab.com where we can use pseudonyms and have earnest conversations about the problems facing our generation - if you're worried about privacy then I recommend creating a fake Proton Mail account or similar, and connecting to Gab via a VPN or through Tor. Otherwise use an internet café like the one across the road from Oliffs Computers in Riccarton (Straven Road, near the mall)

Unlike many other apps and websites, Gab does not ask you for your phone number or date of birth.

Let's do something about the price of rental properties!

For a start, we can distribute letters like this to 10,000 houses in Christchurch and let everyone know that the housing crisis is maintained & manufactured by Parliament. Hate speech laws are coming soon, so speak out against rich politicians and boomers now, before they become "protected groups" that are legally immune to facing any criticism.

We already live in a climate of fear, in which people tone down their language and hide their face because they fear that they won't get a professional job if they are seen publicly talking about politics. We need a little bit of push back. Can you help us?
